CERT - DDAL04-09 The Temptress

One thing that often can make or break a game is not knowing or "feeling the right way" about the setting and how it's supposed to go. An example I would make is for an example playing curse of Strahd, but treating it as if it was any other high fantasy world just with spooky creatures, or playing Dark Sun as if it was a dull desert fantasy world without getting into the right state of mind ...

The ninth adventure in the fourth D&D Adventurers League season, The Tempter, has a lot to recommend it. It makes use of a number of gothic horror tropes that I adore, and it ends with the players having to make a decision that properly evokes the major theme of the adventure:

Temptation. The characters might...Continue reading →
