Debt: The First 5,000 Years redeems the social sciences. Not As a sociologist, I've been despairing of late at the paucity of imagination and theoretical innovation in social science research. Academics, perhaps because of the need to publish quickly and garner grant money, seem content to only add statistical validation to already established conclusions.

For more than 5,000 years, since the beginnings of the first agrarian empires, humans have used elaborate credit systems to buy and sell goods--that is, long before the invention of coins or cash. It is in this era that we also first encounter a society divided into debtors and creditors--which lives on in full force to this day.

Debt : The First 5000 Years - Book Depository

Debt: The First 5000 Years covers a vast sweep of history, anthropology, and political economy, arguing not so much for a single thesis as for a braid of complementary ideas. Among them are: That money originated as “social currencies” used to rearrange relationships among human beings (marriage, funerals, blood money, and other social functions), and was not used to buy and sell things.

A Review of Graeber's Debt: The First 5000 Years | Charles ...

These mechanics are primarily based upon his book “Debt: the First 5000 years”, but the Legality Moves borrow a lot from his essay “There Never Was a West: or, Democracy Emerges From the Spaces In Between”, and likely have influence from other things I have read about traditional, decentralized, and polycentric legal systems from Iceland to Somalia.
