The type of paint depends on the color. If you're doing any color other than black, I'd recommend powder coating. It stands up much better, and when processed correctly, it will not discolor from engine heat. If you want to paint it black, it's cheaper to go with Harley's Black Wrinkle engine paint. It's available through the P&A catalog.

I've used this for a wrinkle black finish on a Harley engine rebuild after bead-blasting the castings. Read and follow the instructions first. Once cured, it is heat resistant on a properly running engine. A word of warning though, the paint will give off fumes and some smoke when the engine is fired up.
