Night Train (1963)

Oscar Peterson is one of a handful of jazz musicians whose accessibility belies his incredible ability.

Capable of some of the hardest swing that jazz ever produced from a set of ivory keys, Night Train is the entry point for many, with Peterson's minimal trio at its peak. This is a truly cohesive unit, with Ray Brown on bass

In retrospect, the era of the mix tape — which began not long after Philips unveiled the audiocassette in 1963, crescendoed throughout the '80s and probably peaked in the early '90s — looks like a vast, unintentional folk art movement. Nearly every music-loving teenager in the country participated.
